A special moment in time

Dear friends,

Ashoka is proud to be celebrating its 30th Anniversary this year. The three decades behind us mark a significant contribution to the development of the citizen sectors of over 70 countries, across five continents. Beginning with the pioneering concept of social entrepreneurship by Bill Drayton, Ashoka's founder and CEO, these past 30 years also represent a historical shift in how societies perceive the agency of individuals to drive social change. Ashoka has managed to identify more than 2,700 leading social entrepreneurs whose new solutions are challenging conventional ideas and changing the world for the better. More recently, Ashoka has built programs and initiatives to extend its impact by mobilizing young people, university students, business entrepreneurs, and the general public to build an "Everyone a Changemaker" world because we understand that the only way to address the growing number of problems is to ensure that there are more problem-solvers.

Thanks to our global network and partners, Ashoka has uncovered various insights about social change and impact. For example, the success of our global association of Ashoka Fellows -- more than half of whom have changed national policy after five years -- allows us to understand that the most profound change occurs when an entrepreneur pursues a system-changing idea. A further insight is that the scaling and replication of these models requires a particular enabling environment. Ashoka calls this enabling environment an "Everyone a Changemaker" world. This is a world that responds quickly and effectively to social challenges and where every individual is equally empowered to affect social change.

At this special moment in time, an unprecedented number of social entrepreneurs gathered in Paris from June 20-24, 2011, to define and develop the necessary ecosystem for accelerating social change in Europe, while learning equally from the experiences of other innovators around the world. It was characterized by two ideas: Collaborative action and concentration of change-makers. And while this publication cannot possibly reflect everything that happened in Paris, it will hopefully provide you with a fascinating and inspiring snapshot of Ashoka at 30 years.

As you are reading the following pages, we would ask you to "lean forward" and not "lean backward", to identify opportunities for action. You are very much part of the movement thousands Ashoka Fellows and supporters are building across the world -- and everyone listed in the directories at the end of this document will be keen to engage with you on your journey to changing the world. The world Ashoka ultimately strives to create is about everybody affecting change, and we welcome you as a co-creator.

Getting together to celebrate change

The idea came to Ashoka founder Bill Drayton 30 years ago: to harness the entrepreneurial spirit of socially-minded individuals and give them the tools they need to spread their idea throughout their community and across the world. 2,700 Ashoka fellows later, Drayton's idea of social entrepreneurship has become global, with hundreds of fellows introducing projects in multiple countries and creating changes that have affected millions of lives.

For Drayton, however, his work has just begun. Having enabled thousands to find solutions to global problems is just the start of an “Everyone a Changemaker” world. As society evolves at an ever-escalating pace and old institutions are broken down, Ashoka's hope is to have all people find their own way to be a Changemaker in a more global and connected world.

With the first event of this kind, Ashoka celebrated its 30th birthday by bringing together more than a thousand social entrepreneurs, private business people, finance experts and young changemakers for a weeklong convention aimed at spreading ideas and formulating new ones. The event, held at Paris business school HEC, included small focus groups, informational seminars, interactive projects and the introduction of Ashoka's Youth Venture program in France. It was a gathering of energy and creativity as well as an example of how Ashoka has influenced the corporate world.

Historically, big businesses have typically put their philanthropic dollars toward charities, often removed from the donation with the exception of a banquet dinner or thank-you note. With Ashoka's aim to make Everyone a Changemaker, however, companies interested in spending their dollars with the organization are themselves promoting social entrepreneurship. This is evident through the participation of Ashoka's biggest donor, Germany-based pharmaceutical company Boehringer Ingelheim, at the “Changemakers' Week” in France. Not only did the company commit to three years of supporting 50 Ashoka fellows who have projects aimed at changing the healthcare system, but the 150 year-old company also sent 40 of its own employees to immerse themselves in the Ashoka conference and work closely with the social entrepreneurs.

With almost 3,000 fellows in dozens of countries, Ashoka's vision of a world where every person has the freedom, confidence and support to enact change is getting ever closer to reality and will hopefully be fully realized well before Ashoka's 60th birthday.

How to build a global team of teams

When it comes to tearing down walls between sectors, Ashoka fellow Caroline Casey could be considered a sledgehammer. The aim of her organization, Kanchi, is to break through the barriers between the disabled community and the rest of society by working with businesses to view the community, which totals 15 percent of the world population, as a valuable and necessary part of their employee and consumer base.

“The only way that this will work is a five stakeholder approach: we need the politicians, the business leaders, the disability community, the philanthropists and we need the media,” said Casey, at the Working Across Silos presentation during Ashoka’s Changemakers’ Week in Paris. The presentation, meant to give changemakers tips and ideas for enhancing their impact by working with other sectors, was itself an example of cross-sectoral collaboration with Casey and speakers Bill Drayton, Christian Boehringer of Boehringer Ingelheim, Michael Barnier with the European Commission, Ashoka Youth Venture fellow Sejal Hathi, founder of Girls Helping Girls and journalist David Bornstein.

“The great challenge today is to help figure out how to integrate the world and solve problems together,” said Bornstein. “This is a challenge because the walls that have been built up between these institutions and these sectors are very strong and very resistant to change.” The aim of collaborative entrepreneurship is to take the change social entrepreneurs are making within a society and turn it into an overall societal change. This can happen by creating teams that include social entrepreneurs, businesses and governments, with each player lending their resources and expertise in order to facilitate development more quickly and effectively. “We really do want, five years from now, anyone who is doing strategy to say ‘There is a wall and very likely if we tear that wall down we’ll have a huge productivity gain,’” said Drayton. “And for them to ask themselves, ‘how do we do that?’”

It is a question Christian Boehringer asked himself when Boehringer Ingelheim was looking to lend its resources and capital to tackle a world problem. “We wanted four things: to have a global topic, to draw on the engagement with the shareholders, our employees and the community, to find a global partner and to ensure that we get control of investment as professional as we would normally do within a company,” said Boehringer. The pharmaceutical company eventually decided that finding solutions in healthcare would fit in best with its area of expertise. By teaming up with Ashoka, they were able to pinpoint the social entrepreneurs with the most innovative and sustainable ideas for the field. The collaboration led to a multi-million dollar investment that will support 50 social entrepreneurs for three years and ideally find solutions to some of the many health problems the world faces today. It’s another step towards a society in which teams team up for change.

“We don't have the option of going slowly”

The rate of change in the world is going up exponentially. Empathy, leadership and teamwork are the essential skills to shape the future, and with its Youth Venture Programs Ashoka encourages young people to become changemakers before they reach adulthood. Bill Drayton, Ashoka's CEO and founder, explains how a culture of change is created within schools

Interview by Jenny Hoff

Why is getting the youth to become changemakers so important?

If any country is going to make the transition from a few people running everything and everyone else doing repetitive functions to a world where everyone is contributing to change, because that is what required, every young person has to be a changemaker before they become an adult. They have to actually experience and practice being a powerful person. That means mastering the skills of empathy, so you can work with and understand others, teamwork and leadership. It also means using all those skills to cause change, which is very different from leading a repetitive function activity. What Youth Venture is about is to make sure that every young person has that experience, which means you have to change how middle and high schools work so the youth culture in those schools, in the neighborhoods and at home is to say “take initiative now.”

How do we make that happen?

That's exactly the question we're asking ourselves. How do we, working together, actually change the system? It turns out that one of the key variables is there has to already be some young people who have the imagination and courage to say “I have an idea. I'm going to get my friends together and we're going to create a tutoring service. Or, we are going to solve an environmental problem.” If you get a couple of people in a school to do that, you can tip the culture of that school so it becomes normal. So, when young people come into that school they are being recruited by others to join their team and they're encouraged to start their own ideas. There are many schools that do this now, but they typically serve the elite. What we want is for every young person to have that experience, for it to be a normal part of growing up. We want parents to understand that when your 15 year old daughter says, “you know, this is a mess,” that is your opportunity to say “Well, why don't you get your friends together and fix it?” Parents can help their kids understand that this is one of the most critical things they have to do. This is their opportunity to acquire, through practice, critical skills that they're going to need by the time they are 25 or 30.

How do Ashoka's Youth Venture programs help facilitate this change?

We have Youth Venture programs across the world and we are continually adding more. Each country has a model that works for them. In Germany, Youth Venture has “think and do tanks,” which takes young people who are already really good at being changemakers to come together and figure out how to make it normal, how to change the environment in the schools and the neighborhoods and religious institutions, so that we remove the barriers to change. In Germany, 70 to 80 percent of young people want to be involved in change, but virtually none of them are. So, how do we change this picture? The idea is a very simple one. You get the young people who best understand it because they've done it. They know what the barriers are and they can figure out how to remove those barriers. They are then bringing these ideas into the schools and getting teachers, principals and students on board. In Japan, it's different. We are working with a very large Japanese company at the moment and the idea is to find some local branches that want to participate with our Youth Venture initiative. The first thing we do is work with the employees in those local branches and teach the parents in the group what they can do to help their kids master empathy and leadership. Ashoka then provides stipends and resources for youth initiatives. Then the impact spreads. If the employees are helping their children master these skills, then the employees are also getting these skills. The next move is the company bringing that to their customers. It is very good for the company, great for moving these ideas out and it's helping the company make the change from being a hierarchy to being a team of teams.

Japan's model is very different from the German model, but the two fit together. They can help each other as well as Youth Venture programs in other countries. That is one of the great powers of this new stage of Ashoka, that we are a global team of teams. We've got a clear understanding that we are moving to an Everyone a Changemaker world. We are privileged to see that and help others see it. We are a community of entrepreneurs. If there is one thing we should be able to do, it is to use our entrepreneurial ability - individually and as an Ashoka wide team of teams - in helping us get there. Getting there means making sure every young person is a changemaker before they are an adult.

How can you use the network you already have to spread this idea of youth being changemakers?

It's a collaboration of hundreds of fellows across the world, entrepreneuring together to make this change happen, so that every young person is a changemaker. Ashoka fellows have young people they care for and can teach the skills of empathy to and they also know thought leaders in their communities, who they can help teach about the importance of this change. It's about breaking down traditional structures.

Take for example the work we are doing to tear down the barrier between business and social initiatives. You can't get to a global team of teams that is fluid if you have a sharp division so that these two halves of society can't work together. We've shown that there is a huge gain of productivity for everyone when you move from a world where you have one set of institutions that are businesses and another that is social and both are trying to serve every need. It's a very inefficient model. When you tear down that wall and take the best parts of business and the best parts of social, you create a new system which is able to provide services that weren't there before, like housing. The business people can't serve informal sector workers' families. The citizen sector is great at understanding, connecting and having trust with the community as well as having an economic structure at lower cost, but they are no good at real estate development so they don't get the houses built. You put the two together, houses can be built and everyone benefits.

We can do the same kind of collaboration with schools and influential thought leaders to get the youth involved in an Everyone a Changemaker world.

What kind of model do you propose to make this a reality?

Right now, many people know that there is something wrong with the schools. But, it's only when you see where you have to go, that you see the new paradigm. It's not making sure that more people have access to an obsolete educational model. The old model of 'give them information and get them to follow rules' was fine for a static world. It just doesn't work in a world of very rapid change.

Our strategy is a very simple one: in each major country, we want to find the top five percent of the most influential schools, schools that love to lead and have a track record of doing that. We help them see the goal, help them have access to all the helpful and proven ideas that the fellows have of how to teach youth the skills they'll need for the future. Each school will then come up with its own model. They will be a team and part of our global team of teams experimenting and figuring out how to do it better. They'll be on fire in two or three years because it works and they will see how important it is. Then, they'll help lead the other schools.

At the same time, we will work with the key influential intermediaries: writers, publishers and some key policy people. We can, in each major country, help 30 of these thought leaders understand that we have to get to an Everyone a Changemaker future. Once they understand that, they'll be part of a team to figure out how this generation of young people can become changemakers and how their own town or city can make this transition.

You put those two things together, the schools that have figured out how to make it work and the writers, and you can really tip the system. It becomes the new norm and that's what drives a system. It's a classic example of how entrepreneurs work. You have to know where you are going and then you experiment until you figure out how to do it, how you set in motion the forces that will really tip the world.

What kind of time frame do you think is necessary to spread this idea across the world?

We don't have the option of going slowly, but we can't set the time because history is moving. The rate of change is continuing to go up exponentially. But, we are clearly getting to an awareness tipping zone in moving to an Everyone a Changemaker future.

We need innovation in every aspect of life. We increasingly need our entrepreneurs to be social entrepreneurs as well, so that their core purpose in life is not the pursuit of a narrow objective, but rather for the good of all. The more young people who do that, the more the entrepreneurial forces in the world will in fact be pulling the world to the good of all. Of course we need young people to start businesses, but we also need them to worry about others. Problems are all around young people, just as much as they are for everyone else, and they can see those problems. In fact, it's easier for young people to see problems because they haven't learned yet that they can't solve them. When you think that you can't solve a problem, why would you want to see a problem? That's why so many people don't. But, the first step to being a good entrepreneur of any sort is that you have to believe that you can do something. Then, you are looking for opportunities to apply that skill.

Within five years, I would like to see the culture changed so that every young person is a changemaker and is on their way to mastering the skills of empathy, leadership and teamwork well before adulthood. In order to do that, every adult needs to start teaching those skills now to the young people they know and love.

Ashoka's Youth

A 15-year-old girl is diagnosed with anorexia and on her road to recovery founds an organization to mentor and unite other girls around the world. A 19-year-old boy goes to Sierra Leon and devises a business plan to boost the local economy and build schools at the same time. Whoever said a barrier such as age could prevent someone from becoming a changemaker was never introduced to Ashoka's Youth Venture community.

An Everyone a Changemaker world can't become reality until everyone is on board. That is the reason Ashoka is sponsoring youth projects in countries across the globe. With "think and do" tanks, cooperations with businesses, school programs and seed money for social entrepreneurial ideas, Ashoka's effort to help youth is based on a model that empowers them to help others.

"I wanted to prevent girls from going through the same emotional turmoil that I had," said Sejal Hathi who is now a 19-year-old student at Yale and president of Girls Helping Girls, an organization she founded when she was 15. "I wanted to empower girls to think differently about themselves and catalyze a movement that would enable society to view girls differently as well: as changemakers, as activists and as leaders." Youth Venture provided her with seed money, guidance for becoming a legal non-profit, financial advice and a support network that has helped her bring the organization to 20 countries. Ashoka's Youth Venture can boast many stories similar to Sejal's – young people taking charge of changing their schools, their communities and even countries on the other side of the world. By offering guidance and not direction, Youth Venture empowers the new generation to come up with their own ideas, develop their own business plans and set their own goals on how to create an Everyone a Changemaker world.

Everyone a Changemaker

This article was written by Bill Drayton in 2006 as Ashoka was redefining its mission from selecting and supporting individual social entrepreneurs to finding ways to spread the impact globally and create an Everyone a Changemaker world. It originally appeared in the MIT Innovations Journal

Rodrigo Baggio grew up in Rio de Janeiro loving computers. As he matured into an extraordinarily tall, thin man with a hugely wide smile, he became a computer consultant. However, from early on, he was one of the few in his generation who noticed—with concern—that the young people growing up in the favelas on the hills overlooking his middle-class neighborhood had no access to this digital world.

Because he has the great entrepreneur's tenacity of observation and thought as well as action, he decided he had to take on the digital divide—well before the phrase came into currency—and he has been pursuing this vision relentlessly ever since. While beginning to work toward this dream as a teenager, he learned just how motivated and capable of learning the young people in the favelas were. And also how competent the favela community was in organizing. This respect underlies the central insight that has allowed Rodrigo to have a growing multi-continental impact.

Rodrigo provides only what the community cannot: typically computers, software, and training. The community does the organizing, finding space, recruiting the students and faculty, and providing ongoing administration. The result is a uniquely economical model, and also one where, because the investment strengthens the broader community, it is self-sustaining and a foundation for other initiatives long into the future.

Rodrigo's chain of hundreds of community-based computer training schools now serves hundreds of slums across Latin America and Asia. These schools now have 700,000 graduates.

I got a sense of Rodrigo's power when he came to Washington shortly after being elected an Ashoka Fellow. Somehow he convinced the Inter-American Development Bank to give him its used (but highly valuable) computers. Somehow he convinced the Brazilian Air Force first to warehouse and then to fly these computers home. And then he somehow managed to persuade the Brazilian customs authority to allow all these computers in at a time when Brazil was trying to block computer imports.

Several years later, I got a further sense of how his mind worked, when I asked him why he was starting his work in Asia in Japan. Japan, he said, was the only large Asian source of computers where he could imagine getting people to give them to him. Therefore, as his first step, he had to demonstrate the value of his program to the Japanese in several of their own slums.

That is how entrepreneurs work. Having decided that the world must change in some important way, they simply find and build highways that lead inexorably to that result. Where others see barriers, they delight in finding solutions and in turning them into society's new and concrete patterns.

That much is easy to observe. However, there is more to it. Somehow, an unknown, young, lanky Rodrigo, the head of a new and unknown citizen organization, persuaded the managers of one after another of society's big institutions to do things they never would have imagined. He knew they were the right and logical things to do. Somehow they sensed that inner confidence and found it surprisingly persuasive.

What were they sensing? Rodrigo's words and arguments no doubt helped, but few people are willing to step out beyond the safely conventional merely on the basis of good arguments.

Rodrigo was persuasive because his listeners sensed something deeper.

What Rodrigo was proposing was not just an idea, but the central logic of his life—as it is for every great entrepreneur. He mastered and came to love the new digital world from the time he was a young boy. More important, his values from early on drove him to care about the poverty and inequality he could see on the hillsides rising behind the middle-class Rio in which he was growing up. His values and his temperament had him taking on the digital divide before the term was invented.

As a result, when Rodrigo sat across the table from the much older, powerful officials he needed to move, they were confronting not just a good idea, but deeply rooted and life-defining values: non-egoistic, kindly determination and commitment.

This values-based faith is the ultimate power of the first-class entrepreneur. It is a quality others sense and trust, whether or not they really fully grasp the idea intellectually. Even though they would not normally want to step out in front of the crowd, a quiet voice tells them to trust Rodrigo and go with his vision.

Any assessment of Rodrigo's impact that stopped with his idea, let alone his business plan, would not have penetrated to the core of his power. Our field has been impoverished by too many assessments that never get to the essence.

Nor is Rodrigo's most important impact his schools or the life-changing independence and mastery he provides his students. Consider the impact Rodrigo has on a community when he introduces his program. It is not a school created by the government or outsiders. It is a school created by, funded by, managed by, and staffed by people in the community. The students are responsible for learning and then making their way. Think how many patterns and stereotypes are crumpled by these simple and very obvious facts. The psychological impact is a bit like India emerging from 50 years of falling behind to suddenly being recognized as the new challenger at the cutting edge of the most advanced part of the world's economy.

Accompanying this disruption of old patterns of action and perception is another contribution, and I believe it is the greatest one of Rodrigo and every entrepreneur: the idea of catalyzing new local changemakers into being. Unless the entrepreneur can get someone in one community after another to step forward and seize his or her idea, the entrepreneur will never achieve the spread that is essential to his or her life success. Consequently, the entrepreneur presents his or her idea to the local community in the most enticing, safe, understandable, and user-friendly ways possible.

Of course, the entrepreneur's own life story is in itself a beacon encouraging hundreds of others to care and to take initiative. This also increases the number of local changemakers.

Moreover, when these local champions then build the teams they need to launch the idea they have adopted, they are providing not only encouragement but also training to potential next-generation local changemakers.

As the field of social entrepreneurship has grown and multiplied and wired itself together across the globe over the last 25 years, the rate of this plowing and seeding at the local level has accelerated dramatically. Ten years ago, the probability of an idea from Bangladesh affecting a community in Brazil, Poland, or the U.S. was very limited. Now it is common (the best-known example being Muhammad Yunus's impact on the global spread of microcredit) and becoming more common every year.

As the number of leading pattern-changing social entrepreneurs has been increasing everywhere, and as the geographic reach of their ideas has been expanding ever more rapidly, the rate of plowing and seeding therefore has multiplied. As have the number of local changemakers.

This whole process is enormously contagious. As the number of large-scale entrepreneurs and local changemakers multiplies, so does the number of support institutions, all of these make the next generation of entrepreneuring and changemaking easier. Not only do people not resist, but in fact, they respond readily to this change. Who wants to be an object when they could be changemakers, when they could live lives far more creative and contributory and therefore respected and valued?

People like me who don't take no for an answer

I am an Ashoka Fellow since 2009, and being part of this great social movement has forced me to expect much more from our results on the field, it helps me focus on the right links and I feel supported by people like me who just don't take no as an answer. Thanks Ashoka and Happy Birthday!

An excellent partnership

One year, after a very difficult selection process to become an Ashoka fellow, finally I was elected and was deeply touched by that. I barely knew what that meant at that time. I only knew that I wanted to change the world. And since Ashoka was already changing the world, it was an excellent partnership. This was extremely important for me as a person and for the thousands of families that my organization helps across Brazil.

Bill Drayton is the visionary of the visionaries, because he had the power to not only create the concept of social entrepreneur but also to help them realize their own visions ... I see Bill Drayton as I see Mahatma Gandhi. Gandhi promoted the independence of a nation, India. Bill is step by step promoting social justice and the sustainability of the world.

Stronger and more effective through Ashoka

At Ashoka we learned the power of tackling challenges systematically by looking for patterns and unmet needs; we learned to uncover opportunity by uniting constellations of people and communities that conventionally do not consider their integration complementary; and - perhaps most valuable to the start-up phase of any enterprise - the value of flexible iteration (fail often, fail early is an attitude we embrace)! Although both of us have a track record of starting initiatives, there is a distinction of 'pre' and 'post' Ashoka that we can gratefully acknowledge. With our Ashoka experience, we can say with certainty that Green Loop is a stronger and more effective organization.

I know I'm not alone

Thanks to Ashoka, I realized that I belong to a large network of people who in their own way, are working to make this world better. Although we do not see each other often, I feel the fraternity between members who are part of this network, and this is very precious to me. I know I am not alone.

Ashoka has allowed me to dedicate myself entirely to the development and the growth of Wapikoni Mobile with a free spirit. And Wapikoni is really flying on its own now. Happy anniversary to Ashoka, and all my gratitude.

The era we live in

One of the most important things about Ashoka is the idea of a community, bringing people together. The Ashoka fellowships that provide financial support for people is important but what really important is meeting other people who are doing similar things or different things. Both can be very valuable ... A community is very important because people can then fertilize and can come up with new ideas ... Everyone a changemaker - that's the era we live in.

So many remarkable moments

First of all, long live Ashoka, its directors, employers and all social entrepreneurs who may arise. We wish many projects to be accomplished and new entrepreneurs to arise.

Second, it was hard to choose what to say because, for us, there are so many facts, activities and moments that have been remarkable: the first interview with Bill Drayton; the Panel in which we were evaluated and selected; the Panels in which we participated evaluating future Fellow candidates and so many other highly interesting projects; a meeting with Ashoka Fellows who were working on racial matters, the gathering of Ashoka and AVINA Fellows to talk about changing public policy in Brazil, and many more. Congratulations ASHOKA!

A Europe of changemakers

100 years ago, two ideas launched to change our world:
One in Detroit, one in Rome. In Detroit, Henry Ford began to revolutionize the automotive industry with modern assembly technology. Also 100 years ago, in Rome, Maria Montessori started the first modern kindergarten, the casa dei bambini, the first true educational institution for preschool children.

By Felix Oldenburg

Dear

Ashoka Fellows, dear friends, dear fellow entrepreneurs,

One business entrepreneur. One social entrepreneur. Both ideas have revolutionized their fields and have become a new standard. Today, 50 million cars are produced every year, and the assembly line has multiplied the productivity of many industries around the world. Within the same time, Montessori's insight that even small children need specialized education has spawned a whole field, and has spread far beyond the kindergartens bearing her name

There is nothing more powerful than a big idea in the hands of an entrepreneur, and here in Paris, over the past days, we have brought together the largest number of social entrepreneurs since we built the field of social entrepreneurship on this basic insight 30 years ago, finding the Montessoris of our time, supporting and celebrating them together with the Fords of our time. All of you are involved in and passionate about transformations as powerful as those of Ford and Montessori. If we tap the collective wisdom of the countless conversations here in Paris, we can see that while this basic mechanism is incredibly powerful, we have also developed as a field, taking into account how our world is different to the world of past generations of entrepreneurs. And I believe Europe has a key role to play in this transition, and some of the most exciting times for our field right ahead of us.

If we draw together all the threads we have connected here in Paris, it becomes clear that we need to open a new chapter for entrepreneurship, and also a new chapter in how we operate as a field (similar to how we have evolved Ashoka from selecting and supporting social entrepreneurs to a much broader range of programs): (1) we need an acceleration of the number of people acting as changemakers, (2) we need a revolution in how we support pattern changing ideas, and (3) we need to tear down the walls between sectors and create large scale collaborations of changemakers.

Or, to put these differently: We need a Europe in which people first ask themselves to create change instead of their governments, we need a Europe that achieves a lot with little resources instead of little with a lot of resources, and we need a Europe that repurposes its infrastructures for innovation instead of building another new sector.

1. } We need an acceleration of the number of people acting as changemakers

Change is accelerating. This has always been true in history. What we witness now, though, is that within one generation, almost everything that was true about the world changes – multiple times. Even 50 years ago, Henry Ford’s home city of Detroit was arguably a world center of innovation and entrepreneurship. Within the last 20 years, it has lost 20 percent of its population. No business entrepreneur today wants to be in Detroit.

Changemakers attract changemakers. The question is, which way do we go in Europe – as a continent that has traditionally trusted large governments and welfare systems to solve social problems, rather than entrepreneurs? This is very much what we found when we launched Ashoka not that long ago. 270 Ashoka Fellows later, we know, leading social entrepreneurs are very much the answer to Europe’s future, and they have had a tremendous impact within the very few years of our presence here.

An Ashoka Fellow will involve thousands, tens of thousands, sometimes millions of people directly in change. They find new resources to solve a problem, most often by engaging and empowering the beneficiaries, not treating them as recipients of charity or consumers of a service but as co-producers of a solution, an emotionally competent problem solver in the face of accelerating change - directly in opposition to the way most established European welfare systems deliver services to passive recipients. Imagine what happens as the network of Ashoka Fellows grows in a country, creating critical mass and tipping a whole field towards a new standard of active changemaking.

Recently, we see patterns across Europe in our search for leading social entrepreneurs, and whenever we see such a pattern anywhere in the world, we know that major change is coming: We see an upsurge of Fellows tackling the negative consequences of lives that fail due to pressures of our atomized societies, that are dysfunctional as they cannot emotionally relate, that are disconnected from community and nature, that are out of balance between the demands of work and life, resulting in mental health problems, destructive behavior, passivity or violence. And these are not marginalized populations but everybody: violent or apathetic kids, mentally ill adults, lonely seniors.

These Fellows have something in common: They are uncovering an unhealthy shift in post-welfare societies, and their strategies aim at reconnecting people with their emotional core and with each other in productive ways, often across generations. Whether through re-creating citizen spaces in the heart of cities or re-connecting children to nature - they re-introduce basic skills of empathy, teamwork and leadership and let individuals and groups rediscover that they are not victims of anonymous societies but emotionally competent changemakers.

Yet even the power of all these Fellows combined will only be a scratch on the surface compared to the challenge of preventing Europe from becoming Detroit, and enabling it to become a society of changemakers.

The biggest barriers: common objections and scepticism

In Europe, the biggest barriers social entrepreneurs face are not a lack of funding but common objections, scepticisms we all know: “That’s just the way it is”, and “surely that must be someone else’s responsibility”, and the terrible “It may not work, you may fail” (And perhaps also my favorite “The old days were better anyway”).

And the fact that children do not have any of these objections tells us something very important: We can all be changemakers. And it also tells us where to start: with young people!

How do we create a Europe of changemakers – a place that attracts ever more changemakers in a virtuous cycle? Yes, we can and need to cut down the red tape and make it easier for entrepreneurs to start. (Interestingly, Greece has just created landmark legislation for social entrepreneurs – a country at the brink of failure trusting the citizen sector, quite remarkable.)

We need to transform our standard assumptions about what each of us can do to change the world. This is a set of skills that we know: It requires empathy, teamwork, leadership. Like we have made literacy a global standard from the age of Ford and Montessori, changemaking needs to become a universal skill, and it starts in our schools, our families, our companies.

A true network

Ashoka Europe plans to expand the work of the Youth Venture program to enable young people to experience for themselves how they can change their world, first in small ways through a startup grant and the in ever bigger ways as they connect to the Ashoka community. Ashoka Europe plans to build a program to help every child to master empathy. And Ashoka Europe, of course, plans to elect and support more Fellows. Today we do this in countries that together account for 72% of Europe’s population. We want to be above 80% by next year, creating a true network effect of all leading social entrepreneurs on our continent, together with a much expanded support community of business entrepreneurs, all adding up to a very powerful alliance to create a Europe of changemakers. >

2.} We need a revolution in how we support pattern changing ideas

We need a revolution in how we support great ideas. Money cannot buy social entrepreneurs but it can make a crucial difference to the path and speed of the development of their ideas. Europe is a wealthy continent. Paradoxically, this has led to a citizen sector that lives on the breadcrumbs of this wealth, with grants from governments, foundations, or CSR programs.

All across Europe, governments, foundations and other socially minded investors are doing their best to make smart decisions with the funds that have been entrusted to them. This is hard work. Wherever we look, we see the ruins of pilot projects and the crumbling testimonies of disconnected, failing pet projects. This is what happens when you do not have a great social entrepreneur at the heart of change or when you force a social entrepreneur to follow a roadmap dictated by people who want to build their own legacy.

Europe needs to shift from a charitable view of funding social entrepreneurs to an investment approach, yet one that is completely different (and much smarter) than anything we see coming from the financial industry.

Give it wings

This is hard because the paradigms of the financial world are very established in our minds. They are about growing revenues, increasing profit margins, and exiting at the right moment. An stock investment of $1 in Ford in 1911 would be worth $313,678 today. What is the equivalent for Montessori? And I do not mean: what would an investor have been able to get his money back? I mean: what on earth would she have done with someone who wanted to buy equity?

We have learned time and again, and most prominently in the Ashoka Globalizer program, that the fastest way to grow an idea is to give it wings and let it fly, spreading the new insight to as many changemakers as possible. And not to lock it in, maximize the value capture and increase the margins to pay back an investor. Quite opposite to what the new trend of impact investing suggests, bringing the paradigms from traditional finance to the social sector will only be useful for comparatively conventional ideas with a clear market. For ideas that could spawn a social movement like Montessori's, we need investors who support the spread of an idea rather than purely the success of an organization.

Here, again, as in generating changemakers, there is a special challenge and a special path for Europe in funding changemakers. Not because we have a scarcity of funds but because we have too much of the wrong type of funds in Europe: the un-entrepreneurial kind that flows through enormous delivery mechanisms without accountability or the capacity for change. Fortunately, Europe has two solutions to this challenge, and we do not need one new law or regulation for them: Europe's promotional banks, and a new generation of business entrepreneurs.

Europe's public promotional banks like the KfW or the EIB (each with €400bn assets) have been great success stories in providing entrepreneurial capital to grow entire industries before there was a mature market for them. The renewable energy sector and many others. As one of their executives told me, their job is to lose money in the smartest possible way for the public good. One of them has just decided to invest substantially as a follow-up to one Ashoka's changemakers' online competitions, attracting further capital. There is a huge potential that Ashoka Europe is now tapping, connecting the world of social entrepreneurship and government-guaranteed banks, and leveraging their unique risk profile to create a financing ecosystem that helps social entrepreneurs pursue the fastest way to impact.

Among business entrepreneurs, there is now a new generation of global wealth that is quite different to the generations before: They have built their fortunes themselves and not on family money. They are globally connected instead of focused on regional charity. They are very young and constantly looking for the next big idea. They are natural partners and partners in spirit for social entrepreneurs, we already attract a lot of them, and Ashoka Europe is planning on building the greatest community of these entrepreneurs.

3.} We need to tear down the walls between sectors and create large scale collaborations of changemakers

Finally, we need to break down the boundaries of sectors if we want to scale change quickly enough to solve the accelerating problems of our time. The world of social entrepreneurship has evolved beyond the focus on the individual, yet we are far from realizing the potential of collaboration.

Everywhere around the world, we are beginning to witness the impact of social entrepreneurs collaborating with business to build hybrid value chains. This makes a lot of sense, not only to scale social solutions to market size but also for the businesses who gain the ability to solve social problems impending on their markets, and to see where future change will come from.

The Ashoka Fellowship is like a radar for social change, for impending shifts in our societies, for changes in the marketplace, for new business models even. Wherever new populations become full economic citizens, social entrepreneurs are the first to involve them. Wherever a society transforms itself to a new level, they play a key role. They push the envelope of what is possible, starting with a crazy idea and establishing a new standard. For any business entrepreneur, watching this process is like a predictor of new markets, customers, and of new ways to be parts of historic transformations.

In Europe, we need to learn a new type of collaborations for social entrepreneurs: with the large existing social infrastructures! We have the largest delivery mechanisms in the world for education, health, housing, care, employment and so forth. We see the most successful Ashoka Fellows avoiding to build their own mini-sectors and instead nudge these systems (especially when expanding internationally). Why build footpaths when we have the highways already built?

This challenges the assumptions of our field: When most people think of social entrepreneurs, they think of the archetype that the field has created and celebrated over 30 years: the founder person of a local economic development innovation that lifts people out of poverty in a developing country or emerging market. In his or her economy, there is no alternative to entrepreneurship and self-financing models if you want to solve a social problem. And the growth of his or her new idea is uninhibited by competition from government, and centuries old welfare organizations, churches, associations and foundations.

In Europe, with the blessings of comprehensive education and health systems, state welfare and pensions, social entrepreneurs are rarely completely alone in their fields but often deeply embedded in existing structures. As powerful as social entrepreneurs are, they are deeply embedded in our sophisticated educational, health and other systems. They will scale much faster using them rather than competing against them. We need to build the next generation of collaborations right there, and Ashoka Europe will work through Localizer programs in many regions to build these collaborations. We are advising many of our governments to repurpose existing systems for innovation and create value chains between social entrepreneurs and the entire school system or the entire health system.

Let us not create a separate field with social entrepreneurship, one that is in competition with all of them and lives on the breadcrumbs of charity, but one that is at the heart between the sectors! Social entrepreneurship has barely gotten started in Europe yet.

This meeting in Paris has come at a special moment. History is accelerating. Everyone can feel it: In the Arab world, history is rewritten within one spring. Africa leaps generations of communication technologies with half a billion mobile phone users within only a few years. Asia creates more entrepreneurs every year than the rest of the world combined. In all of these transformations, Ashoka Fellows play key roles channeling the forces of change for good. It may have taken Montessori's idea 100 years to get where they are today. We will not have that time. The change we witness is networked, so the solutions will have to be globally connected as well.

Europe is late but brings a few interesting ideas

My grandfather was born in 1911, the same year Henry Ford and Maria Montessori launched their world-changing innovations. It is only two generations ago that childcare was revolutionized. My daughter is now six months old. What change will she see? Do we have another two generations to solve the problems her generation will face? Who will teach her the life skills of empathy, teamwork, leadership and changemaking that she will need to be a positive force in the world?

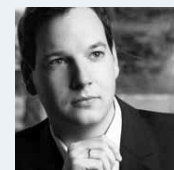

Ashoka at 30 is not about electing great social entrepreneurs and then letting them succeed or not. It is about history in action, about creating the world's largest community of entrepreneurial minds to pull the smartest levers we can think of – to ensure that solutions keep outpacing problems in our societies. In Europe, we have come late to the party of social entrepreneurship, historically speaking. But we bring a few interesting ideas – in addition to the best champagne.

We have only begun the work of Ashoka in Europe, and are stepping out of national launches as the only organization connecting social innovators across all of Europe. We are just getting started!

When I look around me today, I see everything we need for this acceleration, for a step change, not an incremental increase in the size and scope existing solutions but in launching the Maria Montessoris of our time, the bottom-up, local champions of social innovation, who will not rest, who will overcome all barriers, who will accept risk, lead us out of our comfort zone and create a society that empowers people with disabilities to compete in new ways, that produces entrepreneurship rather than joblessness, that connects indigenous knowledge to fair world markets, that enable children to be problem solvers, that make our democracies transparent and accountable, that recreate safe and sane relationships to agriculture and food, and that pioneer health care for everyone across distances – in other words, that will achieve as much and more in the next 10 years as the past generations of entrepreneurs have in the past 100 years.

Thank you all for this extraordinary gathering: Thank you to the Fellows, thank you to our friends and guests, thank you to the many supporters of this event, and most of all, thank you to the French team for making Paris the center of the world for these days. <

It made my dream come true

Although money is not everything, the Ashoka stipend I received for 3 years made my dream to have our own radio station come true.

Thanks to the Ashoka network (and especially its Indonesia staff at the time Helen and Marjie), and in partnership with HAPSARI (Himpunan Serikat Perempuan Indonesia – Congregation of Women Union Indonesia), we built the Women Community Radio Station, HAPSARI FM. And we're very proud of that.

Ashoka has become part of my life story, that can never be changed, and I value that very much. Happy birthday Ashoka ...

Keeping alight the flame

I write in this birthday card to celebrate the anniversary of Ashoka! Perhaps, I am one of the oldest social entrepreneurs, one of the deans as I like to say.

I am keeping alight the flame of social entrepreneurship, as I did in the late 1980's when I became an Ashoka Fellow in Brazil. The spirit of Ashoka took root in me and never left!

I am very grateful for this and wish Bill, the entire direction of Ashoka, and the Fellows throughout the world all the wisdom, courage and determination in order to change the unjust structures in which our societies are installed.

You never retire from Ashoka

In 1994, I was hired to lead Ashoka Poland. At the time, Ashoka had not yet streamlined its global operations so I needed to learn how to identify the characteristics of a social entrepreneur on my own. Quite a challenge in a country where “entrepreneurship” had a negative connotation, especially just after the romantic Solidarity movement - a movement driven by passion and heart (...)

After 15 years with Ashoka, I “retired” at the age of 65. But did I stop working? No way: I joined academia to research social change as driven by Ashoka Fellows: what makes it unique? How do social entrepreneurs in fact achieve durable and irreversible social change? How do they involve and empower groups and societies, given the words of Peter Drucker: “Social Entrepreneurs change the performance capacity of a society”?

My research revealed some insights on the personality traits of Ashoka Fellows, as compared with leading social activists and with a random sample of the society. I also managed to pin down some innovative methods used by social entrepreneurs. And this was real big-bang stuff! Scholarly articles followed, and the university got truly excited. My ‘retirement’ then accelerated even further, into more research and more publications, and even more excitement.

Who's retired?

The best present to Ashoka

It has been great knowing Ashoka! I never had the slightest idea I would fit into the definition of a social entrepreneur, but I ended being one. Somebody once said that Bill Drayton should be nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize. Why don't we (as fellows or world citizens) get organized to make this nomination come true? I think this could be the best present we could give for the 30th Ashoka anniversary.

HAPPY BIRTHDAY, ASHOKA!

Our community of friends and entrepreneurs sent us messages from all over the world. Here are some of their stories they want to share

Spotlight: Can entrepreneurs save the world?

A new alliance for global change

Working together, corporations and social entrepreneurs can reshape industries and solve the world's toughest problems. This article was first published by Harvard Business Review in 2010

By Bill Drayton and Valeria Budinich

Idea in Brief

The time is ripe for collaboration between for-profit businesses and mission-driven individuals and organizations. By forming “hybrid value chains” the for-profit and citizen sectors can together remake global economies and create lasting social change. Businesses offer scale, expertise in operations, and financing. Social entrepreneurs offer lower costs, strong social networks, and a deeper understanding of customers and communities. Example: Local citizen groups helped to persuade Amanco, a maker of water-conveyance products, that small farmers in Mexico represented a significant market opportunity. They partnered with the company to organize farmers into loan groups, promote irrigation technologies, and even install systems. The social entrepreneurs are helping the farmers get financing so that they can afford Amanco’s products. This newly created drip irrigation market is worth about $56 million a year – and farmers are enjoying higher yields.

witnessing a sea change in the way society’s problems are solved, work is performed, and businesses grow. Collaborations between corporations and social entrepreneurs can create and expand markets on a scale not seen since the Industrial Revolution. These markets will reach everyone, but especially the 4 billion people who are not yet part of the world’s formal economy. They will offer new and remarkable products and services in sectors as diverse as education, transportation, and finance.

You may be skeptical of this claim, and with good reason. The citizen sector—the term we use to define the millions of groups established and run by mission-minded individuals across the globe who are attempting to address critical social needs—has long been regarded as understaffed and inefficient. But that has changed. We work with some 3,000 social entrepreneurs worldwide, and over the past 30 years we’ve seen the citizen sector catch up with business as it has increased its productivity, size, and reach. Its organizations are attracting talented and creative leaders, and their work is changing the game in critical industries and areas such as energy and health care.

For-profit organizations today have an opportunity to collaborate with citizen-sector organizations (CSOs) on large-scale problems that neither group has been able to solve on its own. The power of such partnerships lies in the complementary strengths of the participants: Businesses offer scale, expertise in manufacturing and operations, and financing. Social entrepreneurs and organizations contribute lower costs, strong social networks, and deep insights into customers and communities.

But to work together effectively, they must focus on creating real economic as well as social value. We believe they can do so by forming what we call hybrid value chains (HVCs), which capitalize on those complementary strengths to increase benefits and lower costs. This trend has been developing for years, and we've participated in pilot projects that have delivered impressive results and promise extraordinary growth. HVCs can now be found in many industries all over the world. Collaboration between corporations and CSOs has reached a tipping point: It is becoming standard operating procedure. Indeed, we believe that if you're not thinking about such collaboration, you'll soon be guilty of strategy malpractice.

The vibrancy of the citizen sector

Before we explore the inner workings of hybrid value chains, it may be helpful to look at how we got here. In the 1700s business became entrepreneurial. Upstarts devising faster and more-efficient ways to produce goods ushered in the Industrial Revolution. They introduced innovation after innovation, ultimately changing the world. After remaining flat for a millennium, per capita income in the West rose by an average of 20% in the 1700s, 200% in the 1800s, and 740% in the past century. But while the for-profit sector enjoyed sweeping progress, the citizen sector languished. It faced little outside market pressure and relied heavily on funding from governments that, as monopolies, feared competition. CSOs felt little push to innovate; as a result, they fell far behind in productivity, performance, pay rates, confidence, and reputation.

By 1980 the imbalance between the business and social sectors of society had become intolerable. (We had great TVs but lousy education.) New opportunities emerged across the world (except where governments got in the way), and the citizen sector restructured itself to become entrepreneurial and competitive. It rapidly increased productivity and scale, lowering the cost of goods and services it provided relative to business's offerings.

Since then, the citizen sector has been creating jobs about three times as fast as have other employers in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries. In Brazil the number of CSOs rose from about 36,000 to nearly a million over the past 20 years. In the United States their number has grown by more than 300% since 1982. Today millions of these groups attract talented individuals who long for challenging and lucrative work that is consistent with their personal values and goals.

Take David Green, who helped start Aurolab, an India-based non-profit that produces intraocular lenses to restore sight to cataract patients. It has managed to reduce the price of lenses from $500 to $10 or less, by using emerging technology and restructuring its manufacturing costs. Aurolab is the manufacturing division of Aravind Eye Hospitals, which charge patients for the lenses on a sliding scale depending on their income. It has captured about 8% of the global intraocular lens market and sells about 1.5 million such lenses each year in 109 countries. Green, working with Ashoka, the International Agency for the Prevention of Blindness, and Deutsche Bank, has also launched The Eye Fund, a $15 million loan fund that will enable eye-care groups to grow far faster than they otherwise could, significantly speeding the reduction of blindness.

Or consider Rodrigo Baggio, who created a chain of computer schools serving hundreds of slums across Latin America and Asia. He persuaded one organization after another to donate, warehouse, and transport their used computers, and thousands of slum dwellers to set up and run the schools. These schools now boast some 700,000 graduates.

We could go on and on. But our point is that many social entrepreneurs are already out there changing the world—and businesses have largely been overlooking them. It was previously safe to ignore the citizen sector, because this segment of the economy was relatively small in scale and low in productivity. That's no longer true. The companies that work with and learn from the sector and its leaders will reach large new markets. They will also gain competitive advantage from new business models and first-mover benefits.

The time is ripe for collaboration because the two sectors are now equally innovative. Together they can promote changes as powerful and widespread as those produced by the Industrial Revolution.

Hybrid value chains

Hybrid value chains represent a systemic shift in the way businesses and CSOs interact. They are collaborations that redefine value in gamechanging ways, with each side clearly understanding (and willingly accepting) the risks and rewards.

Understanding the impact of social entrepreneurs:

Ashoka's answer to the challenge of Measuring Effectiveness

This article from 2007 analyzes how Ashoka has supported leading social entrepreneurs for the first 25 years by investing in them and connecting them to a global community of their peers. Today's Ashoka Fellowship consists of more than 2,700 social entrepreneurs working in every area of human need – from health care and education, to civil justice and the environment. Ashoka has no religious or political affiliation and receives funding primarily from individuals, volunteer chapters, foundations, and business entrepreneurs.

By Noga Leviner, Leslie R. Crutchfield, Diana Wells

Social entrepreneurs play a unique role in creating world change. They are distinguished from other citizen sector leaders by their long-term focus on creating wide-scale change at the systemic level. This type of change is often difficult to measure. Many of the methodologies designed to assess impact in citizen sector organizations today focus on easily-quantifiable figures such as financial ratios or programmatic outputs. Such metrics emphasize financial stability and other “hard” organizational factors that lend themselves to quantitative measurement. But these measures miss what Ashoka considers to be the most important and meaningful product of a social entrepreneur’s work—systemic social change over time.

Ashoka developed the Measuring Effectiveness (ME) program in 1997 to better understand the progress of its social entrepreneurs toward systemic social change. The cornerstone of the program, the Measuring Effectiveness annual survey, is designed to track the progress of cohorts of Ashoka Fellows over time. This self-response survey is distributed among groups of social entrepreneurs at the five- and 10-year anniversary of their Ashoka Fellowship. The survey employs a group of proxy indicators which track data that can be aggregated across widely divergent fields of work and organizational strategies; examples of some of the proxy indicators include the frequency with which the Fellows’ work has been replicated by other organizations, and the level of influence that Fellow has had on public policy. To complement the broad strokes painted by the results of these surveys, Ashoka staff carry out case studies with a sub-set of the surveyed Fellows to obtain more in-depth, qualitative information.

The ME survey’s proxy indicators are closely linked to Ashoka’s Fellow selection process, which enables staff and peers to make qualitative assessments of candidates’ potential by applying five rigorous selection criteria. This front-loaded selection process is the chief mechanism that Ashoka employs to screen social entrepreneurs at the early stages of their work, and is designed to select only those candidates who are highly likely to achieve wide-scale systemic change in the long term. The ME program is thus a tool that is useful both for tracking the Fellows' progress toward systemic change and for measuring Ashoka's ability to successfully identify leading social entrepreneurs at the launch stage.

This article explores in depth the Measuring Effectiveness program, focusing on the annual global Fellowship survey and accompanying case studies. The article begins with an overview of recent trends in social entrepreneurship and select milestones in performance measurement in the U.S. citizen sector. The article then offers definitions of social entrepreneurship and systemic change that have been developed by Ashoka during its 25 years of investing in and supporting the field. It goes on to present the Ashoka Measuring Effectiveness methodology and includes sample results from the first six years of survey implementation. Ashoka continues to refine its ME approach each year, but proposes that its current methodology provides a useful first solution to the challenge of tracking large groups of social entrepreneurs' progress toward systemic change over time.

Context: Trends in citizen sector growth and Performance Measurement

The citizen sector, often referred to as the nonprofit sector in the United States, is expanding around the globe. Consider that in the United States alone, it encompasses more than 1.3 million organizations and is growing rapidly; citizen organizations grew faster than the Gross Domestic Product from 1983–1998, with the equivalent of 30,000 new organizations created each year (Lowell, 2001). Internationally, the rise and growth of citizen organizations reflects a similar trend. In the 22 countries studied by Johns Hopkins University, citizen organizations now employ 19 million workers and engage the equivalent of another 10 million full-time volunteers. As Salamon (2000) observes, "Few developments on the global scene over the past three decades have been as momentous as the recent upsurge in private, nonprofit, voluntary, or civil society organizations. We are in the midst of a 'global associational revolution,' a massive expansion of structured citizen activity outside the boundaries of the market and the state."

With the growth of the citizen sector has come an increased focus on measuring organizational effectiveness and ensuring accountability. In the U.S. context, factors contributing to this trend include increasing pressure on government managers to demonstrate results because of the recent Government Performance and Results Act (Salamon, 2002), and heightened scrutiny in response to visible scandals such as the conviction of United Way's Bill Aramony in the 1990s. As many established foundations and some high net-worth individuals increasingly emphasize the outcomes of their donations, sub-industries have emerged to support this trend. In the United States, consider the launch in 1997 of the foundation affinity group, Grantmakers for Effective Organizations (GEO), and the creation in 2000 of the Center for Effective Philanthropy. New institutions such as these have helped further the development of methodologies to evaluate performance and measure impact, building on earlier contributions by Drucker, the W.K. Kellogg Foundation, and others who built influential frameworks for measurement in the sector (Drucker 1990, Patrizi 1998). The focus of the recently-developed methodologies has moved toward assessment of outcomes (such as the rate by which teenage pregnancy has been reduced) and away from measurement of programmatic outputs (such as number of clients served or number of sites opened). Independent Sector, a nonprofit membership organization, asserts that outcomes assessment was new to most private nonprofit organizations as recently as 2001 (Morely, 2001).

The recent rise of venture-style philanthropy has also influenced the outcomes assessment debate. Venture philanthropists adapt commercial venture capital and investment industry techniques to the challenge of supporting and growing nonprofit organizations. The U.S. venture philanthropy wave gained real momentum after Harvard Business Review published in 1997 the article, "Virtuous Capital," which provided side-by-side comparisons of philanthropic foundation and venture capitalist approaches to funding organizations. In "Virtuous Capital," Letts et al. suggest that some of the advantages of the for-profit venture capitalists' approach include longer investment time horizons (typically seven years rather than two to three), closer relationships with "investees," and a focus on building capacity to deliver goods and services, rather than funding individual programs (Letts, 1997). Subsequent reports published by Venture Philanthropy Partners (2000) have tracked the development of this emerging field. >

The trend toward venture-style investing has contributed to heightened interest in social entrepreneurship in the United States, as venture philanthropists seek entrepreneurial nonprofit “investees” who can maximize the value of their donations through increased social change on regional, national, and even international scales. Toward this end, venture philanthropists have employed new sets of tools to track the impact of social entrepreneurs. In one prominent example, Kaplan’s balanced scorecard brings together several performance indicators and consolidates them into a single measurement tool, which is useful in measuring progress towards an organization’s mission. However, the balanced scorecard largely serves as an internal management tool rather than as a mechanism for assessing external impact (Clark, 2003).

REDF’s Social Return on Investment (SROI) strategy presents another pioneering approach to the challenge, one that involves assigning quantitative values to qualitative indicators of social change. The application of SROI has many challenges; for instance, REDF includes as inputs to the SROI formula, “social outcomes of ordinarily difficult-to-monetize measures of social value, such as increases in self-esteem and social support systems, or improvements in housing stability” (REDF, 2005). Monetizing intangible factors such as self-esteem is both extremely time- and resourceintensive, and is vulnerable to faulty valuation, among other drawbacks (Clark, 2003).

In the more recent Digital Era, a spate of internet-based platforms has provided potential donors with easily-accessible information about tax-exempt groups that they might fund. Examples of such websites include Charity Navigator, GEXSI, Global Giving, and Guidestar. These groups use data gleaned primarily from organizations’ IRS Forms 990 to provide largely quantitative data analyses designed to illustrate the efficiency and effectiveness of charities through financial ratios. They score each charity relative to peer organizations based on these ratios, offering conclusions such as organizations with relatively low administrative-to-program expense ratios are preferable to donors. Given that the scores are published with limited explanation, “this approach can cause more harm than good” (Lowell, 2005). Websites such as these are not well-suited to address questions of programmatic effectiveness and external societal impact.

The difficulty of measuring effectiveness of any citizen organization is well-documented (Sawhill 1999, Salamon 2002). The field of social entrepreneurship, in particular, presents a specific set of challenges (Kramer 2005). The approaches outlined above offer a helpful array of measurement tools, which have limited usefulness when applied to the challenge of measuring systemic change over time. The following sections explore in greater depth the problems inherent to impact-assessment in the field of social entrepreneurship, and present Ashoka’s solution to the challenge.

Social entrepreneurship as systemic change: Ashoka’s definition

To fully understand the complexities of evaluating the progress of social entrepreneurs, it is first necessary to understand the complexities of defining the term. β Ashoka’s founder, William Drayton, first coined the phrase “social entrepreneurship,” a concept for which he later received a MacArthur Foundation Fellowship (commonly known as the “genius” grant). For Drayton and Ashoka, the term social entrepreneur describes an individual who conceives of, and relentlessly pursues, a new idea designed to solve societal problems on a very wide scale by changing the systems that undergird the problems. This definition includes two critical components. First, the entrepreneur must seek to create impact on a wide societal scale; he or she will not rest until the new idea has been broadly adopted at the national and even international level. Second, the entrepreneur must seek systemic change, defined as the fundamental reform of existing societal systems and/or the creation of new ones. The theory of entrepreneurship as systemic change is traced by Dees to Schumpeter, who says the entrepreneur’s main function in society is to, “...reform or revolutionize the pattern of production...by producing a new commodity or producing an old one in a new way...by reorganizing an industry and so on” (Dees, 1998).
